Creating and developing your content asset library is key to nurturing your brand's relationship with its audience. Yet finding content ideas can be a daunting task for many B2B marketers. In fact, more than 38 percent of B2B marketers find coming up with content ideas difficult.

To assist you in your content development efforts, we've compiled 10 best practices for finding stellar content ideas. These tactics can help you build up a solid asset library that educated and engages both leads and customers.

#1. Start with Your Company's Existing Content Assets

Your first step to discovering valuable content ideas for your B2B asset library is, in fact, your B2B asset library. Explore your existing content and reuse relevant assets. This can save you valuable time and resources while also curing the ever-so-common writer's block that often occurs during content creation.

You might be surprised how many useful insights you can draw from existing assets. Case studies, reports, presentations, event briefs, project reports, and statistics are all great preliminary resources to share with your audience.

Data-driven content is in high demand. Therefore, leveraging your company's archives is a fantastic way to showcase your industry expertise as well. Any data from research or your own operations is particularly useful and makes for compelling content.

Once you've identified assets that can be published online, you can either repurpose them into content marketing formats such as blog posts and whitepapers or find inspiration for creating new articles, infographics and eBooks. You can also use customer testimonials to reach prospects.

#2. Get Ideas from Your Current Team's Knowhow and Projects

In addition to using existing content assets, you can work with company employees to brainstorm topics. Their expertise can be used to inspire information-rich content.

There are numerous ways to glean inspiration from your team. For example, you can make monthly rounds on what everybody's working on to determine relevant topics and identify successful projects. You can then turn this information into various content assets such as do/don't blog posts, eBooks, how-to articles, infographics, and even videos.

| Create content that aligns with what your customer wants to know. | | | |

A valuable source of content inspiration is your customer service team. They have a myriad of stories about customer experiences with your products or services. These stories can be directly adapted into engaging narratives for blog posts, solution guides, opportunity guides, product comparisons, strategy templates, and implementation plans.

#3. Showcase Your Company's Talents and Insights in Content Series

After digging into your existing content assets and brainstorming with employees, there's one last method for extracting amazing content from your company. It involves getting close with your team members and understanding their top talents and expertise, plus persuading them to take part in your company's content. People's personal insights are especially useful for creating content series.

There are abundant opportunities for a series of content assets. You can make consecutive video episodes that revolve around the daily life in your company or follow team members throughout the work day. An alternative approach is to create an interview or conversation series in which your employees share their knowledge of a certain area related to your business. Get creative and build trust with your team members, as this will help you produce more authentic content.

Other types of content series include webinars and podcasts, which are becoming increasingly popular, or blog posts series that build up significant knowhow in a certain field of expertise. To inspire your team members to participate, it's important to focus on building their personal brands through these content pieces. The series comes from your company's knowledge, but people will be more inclined to participate if they see the personal reward of showcasing their talents and knowhow.

#4. Interview Industry Leaders for Your Blog

Once you've exhausted different content ideas within your company, it's time to look for third-party industry expertise that you can share with your audience. The first step is to identify prominent industry leaders and influencers in your field. This involves thorough market research.

Seasoned experts and active online bloggers are an excellent source of information that can be of high value for your customers. Their own audiences, additionally, can offer a fresh influx of potential leads for your own business. There are different content ideas that can spur from relationships with specialists, including guest blogging opportunities and content partnerships. As with your own team, it's important to determine how you want to incorporate experts into your content.

One of the best ways to leverage industry experts is to conduct interviews. Interviews can be shared on your blog or presented as recorded videos or live events. Hosting the desirable content on your website, rather than on the experts domain, can increase your traffic significantly. Alternatively, you can invite specialists to participate in your Twitter chats to create higher engagement with your online audience.

#5. Get Ideas and Content from Your Current Customers

Your existing customers can also inspire and evoke compelling content ideas. You can illustrate their experiences with your products, or discuss important industry topics once you have developed a good relationship with them. To get to this point, it's worth investing in continuous communication with them, even beyond the point of the actual sale.

As mentioned earlier, testimonials are one of the most successful content formats. Your prospects are likely to find such assets useful, as they demonstrate the trajectory that your first-time buyers have gone through. Testimonials are also highly informative in terms of your products or services' benefits. Instead of a theoretical presentation of what your customers gain by connecting with your brand, they offer an overview of the practical application and the positives coming from working with your company.

Other types of content that can be inspired and created through relationships with current customers include interviews, use cases, surveys, and polls. You can ask your existing community questions of importance to your audience, and then share this first-hand information online. It's also important to make it easy for your current customers to share their knowhow, experience and tips on your blog platform or social media channels.

#6. Learn from Your Competitors

A truly effective way to find great content ideas for your own asset library is by studying your competitors. Their online channels can be a solid source of inspiration for content topics. As they are targeting similar audiences, you can inspire your own content efforts from their research findings on topics and content forms.

The first step is to identify the top performing competitors in your field, or the companies that are employing content marketing in the most interesting and innovative ways. Then you need to carefully study their online presence. This entails reviewing their websites, social media profiles, the language used and, of course, the topics they cover in their blog and social media content.

The purpose of this exercise is not to directly copy their approach, but instead to inspire your own content creation with fresh ideas. There are always different angles to the same story, plus your company has its unique experience and interpretation of knowledge. Your competitors' content can also be a reliable source for industry news and important trends in your field.

#7. Scout Industry Websites and Forums for Trending Topics

Another way to stay on top of recent developments in your industry is to regularly explore relevant forums and community platforms such as Quora and Reddit. It's also important to follow topical social media feeds, news outlets, industry magazines, and newsletters. These resources are available online, so you can easily tap into them and for content creation inspiration.

Additional niche platforms you can explore include relevant industry Facebook groups and Slack chats. You should follow existing conversations or start new discussions whenever possible, so that you can spur meaningful exchanges that will inform your content efforts. Or, you can identify key influencers and participants on these platforms and observe the topics they focus on.

Another way to keep track of news and trends in your field is to use social media listening. In practical terms, this just means following relevant people, like influencers and prospects, on social media and noting the topics they are discussing and the questions they are pondering. These sources can give you a completely fresh take on topics for your content library.

#8. Create a Content Partnership

Another way to come up with content ideas is to consider the possibility of establishing partnerships for common creation and distribution of content. Your existing partners might be open to such opportunities, or you might look to create partnerships with other companies that align with your company's value proposition.

By identifying a common goal, both teams can work on crafting a content partnership strategy. In this way, you can easily get inspiration from your partner's content efforts and apply it in your new endeavor. It's especially useful if the other company possesses assets or skills that fill in skill gaps such as video production or graphic design. Or, they might have compiled or researched valuable data that you can use in the content assets you create together.

Once you've identified your team's strengths, you can work on creating common campaigns. Besides getting ideas for content, such partnerships are very useful in terms of content distribution. The channels and audience reach are doubled, since both companies have existing distribution methods. To inspire your own partnerships, you can refer to some of the best examples of common content creation.

#9. Make Sequels to Your Best Performing Content

There's one more clever way to come up with great content ideas for your asset library that doesn't involve much research and brainstorming. Whether it's a blog post, a guide, a video or an infographic, if you see that it works with your audiences, create a sequel to it. This is a tried-and-true method that many content marketers are applying today to grow their content base and to benefit from top-performing content.

To determine which pieces of content merit sequels, it's important to carefully review, and analyze previous assets to identify successes. Naturally, this involves using Google Analytics to see which pieces drove the most organic traffic to your website. Then, it's useful to focus on understanding the language, visuals and timing that work best, so that you can leverage these findings for future content creation and distribution.

#10. Go Beyond the Limits of B2B Marketing

When you've exhausted all the different methods for creating content, it's time to explore methods beyond the typical B2B marketing approaches. Who said that creativity doesn't have a place in B2B? Use your imagination to break the common patterns of content creation, and this might even turn into your best content.

If you are completely out of ideas, using a content idea generator can be a smart way to spark your creativity. Another way to go about it is to research what's trending in B2C content and check what has been adapted in B2B already. If you identify approaches that haven't been applied yet, you can try them out and pioneer them in your field.

Content marketing is here to stay, so it's important for B2B marketers today to get a hold of their content efforts. Coming up with content ideas for your B2B asset library can be tough, especially after months of creating content consistently. However, if you're ever stuck when brainstorming content ideas, these 10 best practices can be give a welcome shake up to your content production.
